CAO Update

Building for today and the future

I am pleased to introduce a new monthly CAO Update in Umacuk YG News. Each month, I will share some of the work taking place across Yuułu?it?ath Government Administration—particularly initiatives that affect services to citizens, our community and the Nation’s longer-term future.

Over the past several months, our Administration team has been working on many priorities, both visible in the community and behind the scenes. While not every initiative produces immediate results, together this work is about building a stronger, more effective government that can better serve citizens today and into the future.

Housing and infrastructure continue to be major priorities. Work associated with the five new homes is substantially complete. When the proposed 30-unit housing development faced a significant funding challenge, Administration pursued an alternative through the federal Build Canada Homes program. The Nation’s proposal has now been accepted for further progression, with approximately $9.5 million requested. While final funding is not yet confirmed, this is an important step toward moving the project forward.

We are also looking beyond today’s projects. Planning has begun for a potential new subdivision that could create more than 20 additional residential lots, subject to surveying and detailed planning. A funding application has also been submitted for a second water connection to strengthen the community’s infrastructure and support future growth.

Improving health and community services is another important focus. An additional Licensed Practical Nurse has joined the Health & Social Services team, and we are working with outside partners to bring more services directly into the community. Discussions with Helicopters Without Borders have resulted in plans to trial services such as dental care, foot care and other health supports without direct cost to the Nation.

Citizens will also begin seeing work on a Community Cleanup and Beautification Initiative. The first phase will focus on working with community members to remove derelict vehicles, campers, appliances and other large discarded items. Over time, the initiative will expand to landscaping, native plantings and improvements to prominent public spaces.

Some of the most important work is less visible. Administration has been working hard to strengthen the Nation’s financial, human resources and technology systems. This includes progressing the annual financial audit, addressing several years of outstanding reporting to funding organizations, and improving IT security and infrastructure. These foundational systems matter because they help protect the Nation’s resources, maintain access to external funding and support reliable services for citizens. More than 150 obsolete or unnecessary IT accounts and accesses have also been addressed as part of work to reduce cybersecurity risks.

Finally, our Senior Management Team recently completed a strategic planning process to identify priorities for the next 12–18 months. A central theme was moving beyond responding to immediate issues and building the systems, people and plans needed for the future. Housing, economic development, stronger services, infrastructure, organizational capacity and accountability will remain important areas of focus.

There is much more work ahead, and many of these initiatives will take time. My commitment is to keep citizens informed about the work Administration is undertaking and, most importantly, how that work contributes to a stronger Yuułu?it?ath Government and better outcomes for the community.

Saasin Čačimḥiyap Garden

A place for the community

The Saasin Čačimḥiyap Community Garden in hitaču is in full swing and producing plenty of food for the community.

This is the second full season for the community garden, which was constructed back in 2024 after the retirement of the Wya Community Garden at the Junction.

Garden lead Zoe Jordan explained that citizens are starting to engage more with the garden in its second year. She has seen YG staff stopping by on their lunch breaks to spend some time outside, and the garden even hosted an Elders Health Luncheon in August.

“Most of the meals for that lunch were made from what we harvested from the garden,” Jordan explained.

Jordan, along with garden assistants Bree Heron and Sheldon Touchie, has hosted tea-making workshops with medicinal herbs grown in the garden. The team has also worked with the q̓ayačik̓iis Childcare Centre to make sure hitaču children have a chance to spend some time in the garden and learn how to grow their own food. Jordan joked that the garden became “hitaču’s unofficial waterpark” in the summertime because of all the sprinklers.

The garden’s next project is a fruit stand, where people will be able to stop by and pick up garden harvests.

Her long-term goal is to continue developing the garden program and help Yuuḥuḥiḥath citizens have more food security within the community, as well as the knowledge to grow their own food and preserve it.

For example, daycare students planted potatoes and other ingredients for soup this spring. In the fall, they will be able to harvest the veggies and use them to make a big batch of soup.

“It’s a way of showing them what you can do with the food after you’ve grown it,” said Jordan. “We’re helping them through the whole process, from seed to soup. Some of the potato plants are taller than the kids now.”

During Yuuḥuḥiḥath Day weekend, the garden will be open for self-guided tours. Garden staff are always happy to take the time to show visitors around

The garden will be open seven days a week from 8:00am to 3:30pm, up until the first week of October.

“We always encourage people to stop by and use the garden,” said Jordan. “We have all the herbs you could need, plus tomatoes, peas, beans. It’s really a space for people. You don’t even necessarily have to garden—just come hang out.”

Japanese pavilion opens

Ucluelet's new Japanese pavilion celebrates cross-cultural relationships

Written by Nora O'Malley, Ha-Shilth-Sa

The Ucluelet Japanese Canadian History Pavilion officially opened on a sun-soaked Aug. 29 when 103-year-old Frances Nakagawa cut the red ribbon alongside four women who were also held in internment camps during the Second World War.

Nakagawa's son Keith shared that his mom kept saying it was all "like a dream".

Located on the corner of Matterson Drive and Imperial Lane, the new interpretive site overlooks the Ucluelet Harbour; the very place where one of British Columbia's most significant Japanese Canadian fishing communities once flourished.

"During the 1930s, Japanese Canadian families made up half of Ucluelet's population, living close to Yuułu?it̓aṭh (Ucluelet First Nation) families and European settlers in a community connected by work, friendship and a shared dependence on the sea," wrote Ucluelet historian Phil Hood.

The pavilion – created by Ucluelet & Area Historical Society (UAHS) and made possible through the support of the Japanese Canadian Legacies Society and the District of Ucluelet – celebrates those everyday cross-cultural relationships.

"Before you even enter the pavilion, there is this beautiful interpretive panel talking about the First Nations, who of course were here long before the Japanese, and who share similarities about how they were treated by the government," said Shirley Martin, a lifelong Ucluelet resident and author of Calm Harbour, Turbulent Seas: A History of Ucluelet.

"During the war, the Japanese Canadians were supported really well by the First Nations. I mention on one of the boards that they actually used to share food; they would leave food for each other out on the dock sometimes," said Martin.

"There are so many families who left during the war and never had the opportunity to come back. They will be coming and visiting, plus it's just education for everyone to learn about this whole story that is so important to the West Coast," she continued.

'I feel like my roots are here'

Japanese Canadian Cathy Babyak travelled from Ontario for the opening ceremony. She reunited with her cousin Britt Moberg from Victoria at the event.

"I feel like my roots are here," said Babyak.

"Our grandfather was a fisherman. He came to Canada in the 1900s with his father. They were fishermen before World War Two," she said.

Following the attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941, nearly 22,000 Japanese Canadians were forcibly removed from British Columbia's coast.

Babyak said her grandfather, Risuke Hamade, was detained at Vancouver's Hastings Park temporary holding camp before being relocated to the Lemon Creek Internment Camp in B.C.'s Slocan Valley until the end of the war. After restrictions were lifted in 1949, he went to Winnipeg.

“Obviously, they would have liked to have chosen to go back to their home and their fishing and community, but that wasn’t really a choice for them,” said Moberg.

“When they came to Winnipeg, they were just in poverty. They couldn’t bring much with them to the internment sites. The boat, the house, were sold off by the government without their consent,” she shared.

Almost half of the Ucluelet community disappeared over night, according to UAHS, and the loss was felt far beyond the Japanese Canadian community.

Jeneva Touchie (Čakʷaasiqhwilim) is the manager of language services with the Yuułuʔiłʔatḥ Government (YG). She worked on the interpretive panel that relates First Nations history to Japanese Canadian history with Carey Cunneyworth, YG director of culture and heritage.

“My late grandma Barb often talked about how she remembered when the Japanese disappeared overnight,” said Touchie.

“My grandmother was always willing to share her knowledge, a trait which her daughter Vi took on after she had passed. It is amazing to see Vi’s picture (in the pavilion), as Yuułuʔiłʔatḥ shares a similar history of hardship for our people as well as the Japanese,” said Touchie.

“It’s a dark part of history and (the historical society) really did their best to be true to it and not shy over the difficult parts,” she said.

In Winnipeg, Babyak said her grandfather went to work in a low-paying job at a concrete factory.

“Coming to Ucluelet, I just think, ‘what could have been?’ I take a breath of reflection. You dream... If my grandfather had been able to remain a fisherman, what would life be like?” said Babyak.

A small number of Japanese Canadian families were able to return home to the West Coast. Among them were Thomas and Mary Kimoto (formerly of Tofino), whose family became woven into the life of the Ucluelet community.

Mary Kimoto devoted decades to preserving the history of Ucluelet’s Japanese Canadian community, serving as a founding member of the UAHS and continuing her work until her 100th birthday. Her vision inspired countless volunteers and supporters and ultimately helped make this pavilion possible, notes the UAHS.

“I felt like Mary Kimoto was here in spirit,” said Shirley. “She would have been so proud of Katsumi, her grandson, who was the master of ceremonies.”

Moberg says the pavilion is turning a really sad experience that her family went through into something positive.

“This was not something that was taught to me when I went to school. Beyond not really learning of residential schools and the Sixties Scoop, we also never learned about what happened to Japanese Canadians,” said Moberg.

“They were just people trying to raise their family and work in a community and be part of a community. They weren’t guilty about having actually committed any sort of crime,” she said.

Made with trees from Barkley Community Forest

Master craftsman Jason Sarri constructed the pavilion using traditional Japanese timber joinery techniques.

The project attracted international attention, with TV Tokyo documenting the project over several years and filming the official opening ceremony for broadcast to millions of viewers in Japan.

Sarri says the project began with choosing trees from the Barkley Community Forest.

“With each tree harvested, I performed the Shintō ritual of grafting the tree tip back into its stump,” Sarri said.

The log beams were shaped and smoothed with an ancient Japanese hand adze called a “chona”.

“Nowadays, it is often used for an aesthetic purpose of texturing,” Sarri shared.

Following the ribbon cutting ceremony at the pavilion, Japanese Taiko drummers led the crowd of over 200 down to Ucluelet’s village green to continue the celebrations.

New Staff Highlights

Welcome to Yuułu?it?ath Government Robin Gannett!

Robin Gannett is very excited to be joining Yuułu?it?ath Government's Department of ʕatinkin?aała (Intergovernmental Affairs) as a Policy and Intergovernmental Affairs Analyst.

Born and raised on Treaty 6 and Métis territory in Edmonton, Robin has called Vancouver Island home for the past 12 years. She holds a Bachelor of Science in Geography and Environmental Studies from the University of Victoria and has a background in land and resource management, environmental assessment, and intergovernmental coordination.

After graduating, Robin spent several years working in the geospatial sector with Terra Remote Sensing Inc., collecting and analyzing remote sensing data for large-scale environmental, energy, and transportation projects across North America. Most recently, in her position as a Referrals Coordinator for SṠÁUTW First Nation, Robin managed intergovernmental engagements with Indigenous governments, Crown agencies, and proponents on a variety of land and water projects, working on complex environmental assessments, legislative and regulatory amendments, and policy proposals.

Robin looks forward to bringing this experience into her new role to support Yuułu?it?ath Government in advancing its rights, interests, and priorities throughout consultation and engagement processes.
